

Certainly! Here's a simple example of a speech for rejecting a research proposal while maintaining a professional-development tone:

---

Subject: Feedback on Research Proposal Submission

Dear [Researcher's Name],

Thank you for submitting your research proposal titled "[Proposal Title]." We appreciate the effort and dedication you have put into developing this project.

After careful consideration by our review committee, we have decided not to move forward with your proposal at this time. This decision was not made lightly, and I want to assure you that it reflects our current project criteria and resource availability rather than the quality of your work.

While your proposal presented an intriguing concept with potential impact, there were some areas highlighted by the reviewers that could benefit from further refinement. Specifically, [mention any major issues like methodological concerns or need for stronger grounding in current literature].

I encourage you to consider these points and revisit your proposal. We are more than willing to provide additional feedback or discuss avenues for integrating this work into future submission rounds that may align more closely with our strategic objectives.

Thank you once again for your submission and your commitment to advancing research in this field. We look forward to the possibility of collaborating with you on future projects.

Best regards,

[Your Full Name]

[Your Position]

[Organization's Name]

---

This speech seeks to focus on constructive feedback and encourages development while acknowledging the hard work put into the proposal.