

Certainly! Here's a simple example of a speech for raising an objection in a university faculty council meeting:

---

"Chairperson, esteemed colleagues,

I would like to raise an objection regarding the proposed amendment to the departmental curriculum that was circulated last week. While I understand and appreciate the intention to update and streamline our courses, I have concerns about the reduction of practical lab sessions in the new proposal.

Practical experience is critical for our students, providing them with hands-on skills that are essential in their professional development. Reducing lab hours could diminish the quality of education we offer and potentially impact our students' future opportunities.

I propose that we reconsider this amendment or work towards a balanced solution that maintains the integrity and effectiveness of our curriculum. Perhaps we could explore alternative ways to integrate theoretical and practical elements rather than reducing contact hours. I urge the council to consider the long-term implications this change might have on our students and our department's reputation.

Thank you for considering my objection."

---