Certainly! Here's a simple model of speech:

Context: A team is discussing the implementation of a new project plan. One team member expresses concern about the timeline being too tight.

Speech Model:

"Thank you for bringing up your concern about the timeline. I understand that it seems challenging. However, I believe we can achieve this schedule if we leverage our existing resources and prioritize key tasks. Let's brainstorm together on how we can optimize our workflow and perhaps identify areas where we can delegate or streamline processes. I value everyone's input on this, and I'm confident that by working collaboratively, we can meet our goals. Let's tackle this as a team."

This model emphasizes acknowledging the objection, providing assurance, and encouraging collective problem-solving.
