

Ladies and gentlemen, esteemed faculty, proud parents, and my fellow graduates,

Today, as we gather here to celebrate our graduation, I can't help but feel grateful for our time together. After all, we've become experts in the fine art of pretending to understand what's happening during lectures while secretly googling everything under our desks.

As we step into the real world, filled with opportunities and perhaps a bit more responsibility than we'd like, remember the important lessons we've learned--like how to survive on ramen noodles and coffee, two of the major food groups.

Embrace change, be adaptable! After all, if we can adapt to early morning classes and the mysterious skill of deciphering professors' handwriting, we can adapt to anything life throws at us.

Some advice: Follow your dreams, unless your dreams tell you to hit the snooze button five times in a row--then maybe reassess those dreams.

As we embark on this new journey, let's aim high, stay positive, and, most importantly, keep our Netflix subscriptions active to remind us that there's always time to relax and laugh, no matter how serious life gets.

Congratulations, Class of [Year]! We've made it--and remember: if you're ever feeling lost, just do what we did the night before exams--panic, then somehow wing it successfully.

Thank you!