

Ladies and gentlemen, esteemed colleagues, and those who only appeared for the cake,

Today, we gather to celebrate a monumental milestone in our company's history. And by monumental, I mean we've managed to keep the coffee machine working most of the time. Truly a remarkable achievement!

It's been an incredible journey, from our humble beginnings in that cramped office, where our filing system consisted mostly of "the floor," to our now slightly bigger cramped office, where we at least have labeled piles on the floor.

We've come a long way thanks to each and every one of you. Jim in accounting--who knew spreadsheets could be art? And Sarah in marketing, thank you for always writing emails that sound much more important than my speeches.

To our amazing team, who can turn a three-minute task into a three-hour meeting, you are what makes us unique. After all, who needs efficiency when we have such charming procrastination!

Today, we're not just celebrating our accomplishments. We're celebrating the fact that none of us have been replaced by robots yet. Fingers crossed for next year.

Here's to many more years of success, camaraderie, and attempting to understand what exactly it is that our IT department says they do. Let's toast to countless more milestones, slightly functional office equipment, and never-ending supplies of coffee.

Cheers to us, the team who puts the "fun" in "dysfunctional!"
