

Ladies and gentlemen, family, friends, and those of you who just followed the smell of free food,

We are gathered here today to celebrate my sibling's graduation--and what an achievement it is! You know, school is like a long road trip. There are bumps along the way, you might get lost a few times, and there's always that one guy in the backseat asking, "Are we there yet?" Spoiler: that was definitely my sibling!

Growing up with them has truly prepared me for life's little challenges. I mean, who else could transform a sunny day into an epic quest once they find out there's a tiny bee nearby? And let's not forget how every morning they performed the magical disappearing homework act--you'd swear their homework had a passport the way it traveled outside of their backpack!

But in all seriousness, I couldn't be prouder. Knowing you're stepping into the real world is reassuring because, for once, we'll all feel very normal next to your extraordinary quirks.

Congratulations on your graduation, sibling. May you continue to mix determination with a sprinkle of that endearing madness. We love you, and we're ready to see what you'll accomplish next--besides a legendary nap today. Cheers!
