

Ladies and gentlemen,

We gather here today, not just as a collective voice against the horrors of war, but as stewards of history, determined to ensure that the lessons of the past resonate powerfully in our present.

We remember the cries of countless generations who suffered under the shadow of conflict. We've seen the devastation, felt the loss, and witnessed the fractures it has imposed on families, communities, and nations. From the trenches of the great wars to the struggles faced today, the echoes of pain are unmistakable.

Our ancestors envisioned a world where peace would be not just an aspiration, but a reality. They dreamed of a future free from the shackles of aggression and fear. We stand here as their legacy, empowered by their sacrifices, bound by their dreams, and driven by their courage.

Let history be our guide. Let us honor those who came before us by building bridges where walls once stood. Let us celebrate differences, cherish dialogue, and foster understanding. It is our responsibility to transform the lessons of the past into actions for a peaceful future.

In memory and in hope, let us commit today to be the champions of peace, the advocates for negotiation, and the voices that echo through time-- with strength, with compassion, and with unwavering resolve.

Thank you.
