

Ladies and gentlemen,

As we conclude this important debate on internet censorship and national security, it's crucial to reflect on the points raised today.

We've heard concerns about the need to safeguard our citizens and protect vital national interests from emerging cyber threats. Implementing strategic measures can help mitigate these threats, ensuring that our nation remains secure in the digital age.

However, it's equally imperative to recognize the value of open information and the freedom it provides. These principles are foundational to innovation, growth, and democracy, which must not be compromised.

In striking a balance between security and freedom, we must seek solutions that protect our citizens while preserving their rights. This is a complex challenge, but one that is essential for our society's future.

Thank you for your engagement and thoughtful contributions to this critical discussion.
