

Ladies and gentlemen,

Today I stand before you not to dwell on a temporary setback, but to embrace it as a stepping stone on my journey. Recently, I received news that I was not accepted into medical school. While it's natural to feel disappointment, I choose to see this as an opportunity for growth and learning.

Life is not about how many times we fall, but how we rise from each fall. This rejection is not a reflection of my abilities or potential; it is merely a chance to refine my goals and strengthen my resolve. I am committed to understanding where I can improve and how I can enhance my application for the future.

I am grateful for the passion and determination that fuel my desire to pursue a career in medicine. This path may have taken an unexpected turn, but it is far from over. I believe that every experience, including this one, contributes to the person I am becoming--a more resilient, compassionate individual ready to serve and heal.

Thank you for your support and belief in my journey. Together, let us focus on the possibilities ahead, turning setbacks into comebacks and challenges into triumphs.

Thank you.
