

Hello everyone!

Welcome to the University! Or as your parents like to call it, the place where their money magically disappears. I'm your orientation guide, and I promise I'm only slightly lost most of the time.

First things first, congratulations! You've made it. You're officially college students now. This is the time to discover who you are, or at least figure out which coffee keeps you awake for 8 AM classes. A little tip: the library is not the most happening spot on a Friday night, but it does come with free Wi-Fi and comfy chairs - a student's dream.

Now, if you don't know what you want to major in yet, don't panic.

Choosing a major is just like choosing what to watch on Netflix--start with one, and if you don't like it, switch a thousand times until you find the right fit.

Let's talk about professors. They're like the weather--sometimes warm and welcoming, other times a little stormy. Don't let the occasional pop quiz rain on your parade.

And remember, the goal here is to work hard and have fun, not necessarily in that order. College is the best time of your life, where ramen becomes a gourmet meal and a nap is a luxury.

In conclusion, take a deep breath, enjoy the journey, and don't forget to occasionally visit your classes. It has been proven to be beneficial to your education.

Welcome aboard, scholars in the making! Go forth and make memories--just try to make more good ones than embarrassing ones. And if not, those make great stories too.

Thank you!
