

Ladies and gentlemen,

Today, we're here to talk about an important topic: academic integrity and plagiarism. At the core of our academic community is a commitment to honesty and trust. Upholding academic integrity means doing your own work, giving credit where it's due, and contributing to a culture of fairness.

Plagiarism, on the other hand, is when you present someone else's work or ideas as your own without proper acknowledgment. This can include copying text, using someone else's research, or not citing sources correctly.

Remember, using proper citations and referencing is crucial.

To avoid plagiarism, always ensure you:

- Understand what needs to be cited.
- Use quotation marks when including direct quotes.
- Paraphrase appropriately and give credit to the original author.
- Use plagiarism detection tools to check your work.

Valuing academic integrity not only respects the hard work of others but also enhances your learning process. By adhering to these principles, we contribute to a thriving academic environment where everyone can succeed.

Thank you.
